Dear Mr. Rigsbee:

Thank you for speaking at last month's annual conference. Your opening presentation on the second day of the conference was a tough time slot. People were getting tired, yet they yearned for good, tangible information that they could immediately implement into their program of work.

You succeeded on every level. Not only did you capture and keep the attention of the audience but you provided just what they needed, in the appropriate portion, and left them wanting to take the first steps eager to come back for more.

Therefore, I would be very interested in exploring a follow up program later next year. So, keep this in mind as you put your schedule together for 2009-10.

We are also enclosing comments and evaluations from the conference. For me the mark of a good speaker is when weeks after the fact you have members quote something the speaker said in his presentation. This has happened three times within the past six weeks. So, I sincerely say thank you for provided good content that was well delivered and beneficial to members. Making them successful is what it is all about; your mission of providing them with the needed thoughts and tools was well accomplished – congratulations!

Sincerely,
